

United Nations Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS)
Media & Spokesperson Unit
Press Release

02 May 2018

Agreement to stop fighting in South Sudan needs to be upheld

The surge of violence in South Sudan's Unity region "looks set to continue despite the Cessation of Hostilities Agreement that was signed last year," according to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and head of the United Nations mission in the country (UNMISS), David Shearer.

He made his comments during a visit to Leer and Dublual in the Unity region to see first-hand the impact of the deteriorating security situation on communities.

"The Cessation of Hostilities Agreement needs to be fully implemented. All sides need to abide by what they agreed to and their actions on the ground carefully monitored and scrutinized," he said.

"The intensification of the conflict is having a serious human impact. Hundreds of people are sheltering next to the UN base. We saw tukuls (huts) burnt to the ground. We were told that elderly people and children had been killed and medical clinics ransacked," said the Head of UNMISS.

"I met a little girl who had been shot through her stomach and back. She is just one example of dozens of people injured and killed over recent weeks," said David Shearer. "We also know that hundreds, if not thousands, of people have fled into the swamps and are surviving on wild vegetables and fruit."

David Shearer and a team from the UN Mission in South Sudan met with both Government and Opposition leaders in the area, urging them to lay down their weapons, reconcile, and work together to build durable peace.

He said the signing of the Cessation of Hostilities Agreement last year had given the peace process momentum, but that it was at risk of unravelling without genuine political will.

"Earlier this year it felt like we were moving in the right direction. But after seeing the effects on civilians of this conflict, I believe there is a real risk that the situation will deteriorate further and undermine the chance for lasting peace."

David Shearer said UNMISS would continue to fulfill its mandate.

"Our job is still to protect people and help them get through these dark times so that the peace process can work and we can find a durable solution. We will do all we can to support the people of South Sudan," he said.

Communications & Public Information Section
Spokesperson and Media Relations Unit
Hiroyuki Saito saitoh@un.org

1

Copyright Note: Please note that this information should be used solely for official purposes and is not for further distribution. We kindly ask that Mission colleagues be responsible users.

Find us on Social Media  Radio Miraya Facebook Radio Miraya Twitter

Facebook

Twitter

YouTube

www.unmiss.unmissions.org